A frequently asked question

We had a customer ask the following:

I've previously used a bag hide I bought from you and had some excellent results. But now I'm looking for a cover that can be used when I'm sitting, standing, lying or moving quietly around. Would the A2 Leafcut scrim cover work? Is it good to throw it over when you're lying on the ground? Is it easy to cover the lens in that position? I'm not sure which camo pattern to choose, any recommendations for forests, open ground etc.?

Kevin's answer:

Our A2 - 3mt handy size piece of Leafcut scrim would be ideal for this. When I'm tracking the Red deer across Exmoor I have one of these covers. It's very lightweight, quick drying and easy to use. The measurement is 3mt x 1.4mt - ideal for throwing over you while lying down or draping between bushes to make a screen. You can also have it going over you from side to side while you are kneeling behind a tripod or sitting on a small chair/stool.

You can pack this material around your kit in your bag, I put it in the large back pocket on my jacket. On some jackets the back pocket goes all the way across the lower back. We have this material in Realtree 'ap' all purpose. The natural colours and the natural patterns help to break up your shape and outline as well as the straight lines of a tripod. A good camouflage pattern will have areas of light and dark which really help break up and hide the human shape. The colour of the camouflage is not as important as the deer and other animals see in black and white - so it is the contrasting shades that is the key to a good camouflage.
